NOT FOR THE TIMID! - THE WINES OF JOSKO GRAVNER

Perhaps it's something in the air, or the wine, but few places on earth have such a concentration of determined, individualistic winemakers as Friuli-Venezia Giulia, particularly in the low rolling hills that stretch across the border with Slovenia. To their fans they make deeply personal, almost artistic wines. To detractors they are fanatical eccentrics ("New Wine in Really Old Bottles," Eric Asimov, NYT, 5/25/05).

Josko Gravner is Friuli's greatest and most influential winemaker. Since 1975 he has produced the finest whites in all of Italy... In the 1970s, he perfected stainless steel technology of fermentation and temperature control. Soon after, just as others began to catch on to his techniques, he abandoned them and went on to master barrique fermentation and aging...In the 1990s, Gravner's friend Udo Fiersch visited Caucasia (in the former USSR) and tried wines fermented in clay amphorae in the ancient style that is still alive in Georgian winemaking. Fiersch shipped an amphora back to an intrigued Gravner. Gravner, who had long studied the effects of slow maceration periods, filled it with wine and buried it underground for fermentation. At a wine dinner in 1998, Gravner revealed the discovery that the amphora had helped him make. He announced to a room full of students, clients, and journalists that all the newest technology, chemicals, and techniques, it turned out, did many things for wine, but they didn't make it any better...Then, with a tinge of remorse in his voice he added, "Wine and food we put in our stomachs. How could I continue doing my work if I have knowledge that what I make was slowly poisoning my daughters?"

The poisons of which Gravner spoke are acids, sugars, yeasts, tannins, wood flavoring, wood chips, glycerin, Arabic gum, polyphenols, extracts, and color stabilizers—the laboratory-made products that routinely show up in almost all wines made today...Despite the controversy, Gravner remains convinced that his ancient methods result in the best wines. He admits that his wines, which are made in amphorae with seven-month maceration, are not for everyone.

"The amphora amplifies everything," he says. "The color, which is very dark, is the most obvious, but there's much more which cannot be explained." Though much of the greatness and weirdness may be inexplicable, it's clear that Gravner's wines are now unmasked, untainted, and beautiful. When asked to describe the difference between his Anfora 2001...and the wines he made previously, he says, "I don't have the words to describe it. It's like being asked to describe someone's soul. The amphora wines have much more spirit."

("A Note from Sergio," Sergio Esposito, IWM e-Letter: February 21, 2006)

The amphorae... are lined with beeswax just after firing (to allow the beeswax to penetrate the clay) and buried in the earth. The Breg white wine is a field blend of Sauvignon Blanc, Riesling Italico, Chardonnay and Pinot Grigio...The Ribolla wine comes from the autochthonous Ribolla Gialla variety, from old vines, up to 80 years of age. ("The Wines of Josko Gravner, A tasting led by Miha Gravner & Jana Gravner," 10/28/05)

Both wines typically exhibit a rich, perfumed nose full of exotic spice notes and colors that lean to the darker end of the spectrum (bronze or amber for the Ribolla, with the Breg often showing a distinct terra cotta tint imparted by the skins of the Pinot Gris). Gravner's "Anfora" wines may prove confusing to the first-time taster, confounding expectations of typicity and blurring the lines between what the categories of "red" and "white" wine. These wines possess both a firm, mineral core and an impressive backbone of tannin. Typical descriptors include butterscotch, clove-honey, dried fruits, wildflowers and exotic spices! Despite their characteristic cloudiness – a further result of extended skin contact as well as a lack of filtering or fining – they are clearly "unmasked, untainted, and beautiful" expressions of the pure, focused fruit and distinct Friulian terroir which Gravner's non-interventionist techniques elicit.
